Q: CSS layout responsive design support I developed a website where I want to load the page on different size screens using media queries. It contains some CSS code to display it in different ways. How to check if the CSS code is supported by the page in all screen sizes. I have added only CSS on the website. Actually, the website is responsive, the content can be fully displayed on different screen sizes. But if the CSS is not supported, the page will have a blank space at the right side. I have added the media query to check the screen size, but I want to check if the CSS is compatible with all screen sizes (which CSS codes I have used on the website). Is it possible to check the screen size in PHP code? A: Well you can't really parse the HTML and check how your styles are displaying or not, but you can check if a particular screen width is supported by inspecting the user agent. If the browser reports itself as being a mobile device, or a phone, you can use media queries for screen sizes which are most useful for phones. More info about browser reporting. You could also add some tags in your head to prevent you from having to worry about non-standard HTML.
